The Center for Educational Partnerships was established to effect long-range improvement in the education of Central San Joaquin Valley students and ultimately increase the number of area students eligible to attend institutions of higher education.

The Parent Empowerment Program (PEP) was established in 2004 through a grant from the California Student Aid Commission and EdFund. Its primary purpose is to empower parents to clearly, unequivocally understand how to help their children navigate the myriad issues related to financing higher education and matriculating to a college or university.

The Parent Empowerment Program has allowed the Center for Educational Partnerships to fulfill its goal of supplementing student and school-centered activities with parental interventions that influence the extent to which parents support their student's matriculation at baccalaureate-granting institutions.

At the heart of the Parent Empowerment Program: Parental interventions based on an eight-session curriculum focusing on higher-education matters. As part of this curriculum, parents participate on campus visits to colleges/universities. These interventions serve families who do not fully support their students' desires to enroll at a postsecondary institution because of deeply rooted cultural values.

Under the general supervision and guidance of the PEP Director, liaison will facilitate communication between parents/guardians and PEP Director.
